Graphic Designer based in Barcelona, specializing in visual communication and digital design.

My work focuses in design applied to digital communication (social media, paid media, web, newsletters), brand development and editorial design, as well as product design and development.

In every project, I aim to build a clear, expressive, and conceptual graphic language, exploring the boundaries of visual communication through genuine ideas shaped by culture and personal experiences.

Short texts, numbering systems, and visual compositions expand the archive into a narrative format, connecting objects to memories, places, and moments, and creating a cohesive editorial body focused on vision, identity, and time.

The building was quiet, light coming in through the glass, dust floating in the air. Outside, the tree stood still, heavy and old, almost watching her. She looked like someone waiting between places, between moments. Maybe between classes, maybe after years of teaching, now with nowhere urgent to be.

There was something familiar in her posture. The kind of person who had spent a lifetime explaining things to others and had finally earned the right to sit in silence. Not posing, not aware of being seen. Just resting, thinking, reading. The kind of presence you don't notice at first, but once you do, it stays with you.

I found these glasses at the end of the night, on the floor near the exit, half hidden by shadows and empty cups. A couple had just left the party, laughing, already outside, and one of them must have dropped them without noticing. I picked them up and tried to catch them, but the music swallowed my voice and the door closed too fast.

For a moment I stood there, holding something that clearly belonged to someone else, wondering how many nights those glasses had already seen. They still felt warm, like they had just been taken off, like the party had not fully ended yet. I waited a bit, hoping they would come back looking for them, but they never did.

So the glasses stayed with me. Not really mine, but not lost either. Just a small object left behind at the exact moment when the night was over and everyone had already started to move on.
